Go for architecture tourism: German prof

Chandigarh: The UT administration has tried its best to project Chandigarh as an ideal destination for medical and film tourism but it is to have missed out on the possibility of showcasing the city's use of modern architecture in a big

'Junk it'
"I observed that the balconies of official and commercial buildings in Sector 17 were being used for storing junk and do not make a pleasant site. If an effort is made to add greenery to these balconies, it would add to the city's charm," said visiting German professor of urbanism and history Thilo Hilpert.

Tourism director Vivek Attram said even though Chandigarh already had the Le Corbusier centre and a city museum, the possibility of some more activities like audiovisual shows etc could be explored.

The German architect added that though in Germany, the trend was to redevelop existing cities, instead of planning new cities, the Chandigarh model can be replicated at other places in India, as the model is as relevant. "Planning a city like Chandigarh is also economical and has the rare distinction of being the ideal abode for the middle class," he said.

As an evolving city, Chandigarh scores on several counts. For instance, I was delighted to hear the sounds of different kinds of birds across the city, thanks to the preservation of green cover.

Thilo Hilpert was in the city to deliver a lecture on "How a German Architect Fell into Chandigarh," at Chandigarh College of Architecture on Wednesday.

Thilo Hilpert, a visiting urbanism professor from Germany, believes that Chandigarh can cash in on tourists by offering to study Le Corbusier's architecture as it has stood the test of time and can be a guiding light for young architects across the world.

Chandigarh is a trademark of modern urbanization in India, and with its location in the high altitude region in mind. The High Court are fascinating pieces of architecture and can be a source of study," he said.

and allays is really fascinating and has proved effective over the decades. Next time, I plan to bring with me a group of my students from Germany so that they could incorporate these points in their individual styles," he said.

"But if the city is to evolve into a popular tourist destination, it needs to organize musical and cultural events throughout the year. Showcasing the city's uniqueness at architectural festivals could be a big draw. As it is, in Germany, more tourists prefer to visit the museums than going to popular spots," he said.

I want to ask the German exchange service to give me help to come with a groupe of 6 - 8 students for 14 days to Chandigarh in the end of April 2009. We can see what we can do as project work; we want to cooperate with Mr. Sharma. So we need for our DAAD an invitation of your school and it would be very kind if you could help us.

India should be proud to have Chd on its map: German architect

CHANDIGARH: "India should be proud to have a well-designed city like Chandigarh on its map," said Thilo Hilpert, a German architect. He was delivering a lecture titled 'How a German architect fell in the city'
